

S/KEY systems have both security and usability issues. In terms of security, they're weak to man in the middle attacks, and any attacks which may involve the third party listening in on communications between the system and the user. In terms of usability, it requires users to keep a list of passwords on them for login (which is also a security vulnerability) and for them to track which they've used. This can be helped, but not entirely fixed.